We observe this or that instance and come to see the underlying principle at work. We come to this real-

ARISTOTELIAN INDUCTION

The main discussions of induction in Aristotle are the following: (i) In Prior Analytics II, 23, Aristotle describes induction and relates it to certain kinds of syllogisms. To have a name for this chapter, I propose to call it (without thereby prejudicing the subsequent discussion) Aristotle's "official account" of induction. According to this

Induction and Natural Necessity in the Middle Ages

Aristotelian universal ontologically depends on particulars in that it would not exist if there were no particulars (aka individual substances) (2b5-7). Universals are middle terms in a demonstration (and hence, in the Aristotelian account of demonstration, they capture the causes of whatever should be causally explained).
